The National Trust

There are lots of beautiful, large houses in Britain. Many of them (1) were built hundreds of years ago. In the past, they (2) were owned by very rich families. Today, many of them (3) are owned by an organisation called The National Trust, which (4) is created to look after them. The houses (5) are kept in perfect condition, and visitors (6) are allowed to look round them. It's interesting to learn how different life was in an old house. Milk was (7) not kept in the fridge, because they didn't have fridges! Washing machines (8) were only invented very recently, so washing (9) was done by hand. In some cases, the house (10) is still lived in today. When this happens, visitors (11) are only shown part of the house. The private rooms (12) are kept closed to the public. These houses often have beautiful gardens, too. The gardens (13) are looked after by professional gardeners.

You usually have to pay to look round National Trust houses. Members of the National Trust (14) are given a discount. This year, millions of people (15) will be given the chance to see what life in an old country house was like.

Doing the housework

by Lisa Porter, Class

At home, we all share the housework. My dad loves cooking, so he cooks all the food. Sometimes we help him, though. Next weekend, for example, we're having a party so I'm going to help him. In the past, my mum did all the shopping. She started a new job last year though, so I've done most of the shopping since then. It's easy, because I shop online. That means I order everything on the Internet (my dad lets me use his credit card!) and someone from the supermarket delivers it to our house.

My brother, Andy, cleans the bathroom nearly every day. He didn't do it yesterday, so he might do it later today. My sister Angelina sweeps the floors. She uses a really old brush. I think she should use a vacuum cleaner!

You can save time if you use electrical equipment. lưu trữ
